"The introduction of weapons, armor, and magic was surprisingly easy to understand. The user interface is great, and the graphics are also very nice." "The characters and events are so fascinating that the boring-ness of the main character's life between the first and second episodes almost disappears." "I can't believe that a game this action-packed and full of exciting scenes could be made in such a short time, but it's true." "I can tell by the thrill from the first episode that the game has the capacity to let you play countless hours." "The adventure is incredibly fun. The characters are amazing and the story is even more incredible." "The energy, music, and graphics are all incredible. The mission system, storyline, characters, sound effects, and various other things are all wonderful." "The game is relaxing, so I decided to play it alone. It was fun to keep playing until I finally ran out of time." "I finished all the battles without encountering any problems, and I was so interested that I went on to play until the game was over." "I want to continue playing, so I'm going to buy the original version." ◆ "A Game that People Think is Awesome" Game players: "Players in their teens have said that they play this game when they're bored or want to quickly pass the time. "In the nine episodes, the protagonist appears to be exploring the huge fantasy world full of events, even when he's just standing around doing nothing. Q: How to derive MySQL tables with fluent mappers' EntityFramework queries? So, I've got a terrible culture going on here at work. We're struggling to come up with how to best architect our database structure. I got bitten by the so called "ActiveRecord anti-pattern", i.e. using database objects directly (over multiple layers of abstraction). So, lets take an example of a store's entity (called Store): Store has Address, City, Country, ZipCode; Address has Country, City, Street, ZipCode Country has State, City, Locality Locality has Area Area has Town Town has Street Street has Number Number has NumberRange NumberRange has Start and Stop etc. All views have address (from the address entity), however only the "show" view (getting an id along with access to the entity itself) actually has address (and country and city) entities. Point here is that I can't figure out a proper way to inform the foreign key (address, city...) to the other tables without never actually casting the entity itself (I get the mapping already from entity set mapping).

What would be the way to have association via address objects, without actually casting to a Magento object. Currently, I'm trying to ask: How can I make an query that would fetch me the country, city, state and locality (which is in a similar fashion Map Types have the important distinction of holding empty strings only). If I make some magic dynamic query, it works. But I feel that there could be found, already built, a way to make this standard, "proper" way of structuring database tables and mapping classes (or mappers) for those tables
