Wings are the limbs of insects.

Flies have control of the number of wings to be made, making it an ideal model system for understanding early limb patterning. The ability to make functional wings in Drosophila on a glass surface has allowed direct visualization of embryonic events in the formation of the anlagen. We observed an abnormal development of wings in flies that were kept in a microgravity environment (micro-G), where the feedback of gravity is absent. We found that wings do not form in micro-G flies, and that cells that normally differentiate a wing are located on one side of the limb. The wings do not form in a pole to pole orientation
