For those people who are looking for a high end finished product that is the most realistic piece of wood. Teak decks are not the only option. Lignia and other types of wood, along with a wide range of synthetic woods and composite materials offer a wide range of options. The next challenge is finding out which is right for your boat. We have asked a number of the UK's best deck builders for their opinions on decks made from the different materials. Never use chalk lube for exterior applications. It will damage the finish of the wood and cause the wood to absorb moisture. As far as the paints go, you can get really high-end paints for an exorbitant price, but you can usually find a good performance value paint at an economical price. It is best to go with the paint that is most suitable to the application.

A vessel that was built correctly on site in accordance with the best practices of the building and woodworking trades should be expected to last a long time. Most of the offshore and long-distance voyaging fleets will last from 30-40 years. Even single hull vessels will typically last more than 20 years. The shallowness of these boats, and the decreased loads that exist, make them much easier to maintain. Even more important, these vessels are suited to a wide range of natural disasters. Their shallow draft and displacement makes them far more weather resistant, including the adverse effects of wind, wave action, and stronger currents. In short, having a smaller or more shallow boat is a major advantage when it comes to being able to survive the elements.
